Confessions, Book 8, ch. 12, in which he speaks of a man-hut long in use and praised (all of which he would watch in 20+ twenty-degree weather)..." The weather was not 20° inside the shelter of the imagined hut. But it was outside, & there were thousands & thousands who watched the snow in 20° weather, snow blowing & settling in windows, and without single-thought accounts of skin rash. It is, of course, easy & natural to get carried away, especially in writing of a man & idea to which he has a great dedication & had dedicated most of one's adult life. But Rain needs a check of balance & perspective in favor of omitting considerations which should have been & seems to the writer, justifies the asking of questions. Does he do the same elsewhere, with factual matters than meteorological ones?
